CLIMATE CHANGE AND DEVELOPMENT

Since its inception the earth's climate has been changing as a result of natural forces. But in recent decades, there have been growing concerns about the impact of climate change that has been caused by mankind's activities during the process of industrialization and economic development. A particular concern has emerged around global warming due to the emission of green house gases, and attempts are being made both at national and international levels to reduce the level of emissions. However, carbon-reduction measures can be controversial, because of concerns that they result in adopting practices that are less amenable to economic development. For India, a country threatened by climate change but struggling to pull hundreds of millions out of poverty, what is the best way forward? Environmental campaigners argue that India's large and growing population and the extent, to which its economy is closely tied to its natural resource base, make the country 'considerable vulnerable' to the impacts of climate change. The world Health Organization has pointed to the adverse effects of climate change upon human health, and suggested that reducing greenhouse gas emissions can be beneficial for health. It is argued that it is in India's direct interest to deal with climate change now the problem is not something that only future generation will experience. Experts have warned the dangers of decision making based on hypothetical worst-case scenarios.

Sukhram Lodhi sat leaning against a rock, his turban over his eyes, the warmth of the sun on his bare feet. His feet told him where he was. They knew the feel of the sand and the stones, and the different kinds of grass.

To his right, a bird twittered. It seemed to Sukhram that he knew what it was saying. Because he was blind, the birds and beasts let him into their world, made him a party in it. He never spoke of this except to his brother Rajbir and his grandfather Shivpriya Chauhan. They never laughed at him for his fancies.

Sukhram was fourteen and he knew that people were sorry for him. But he thought, if only they could guess how beautiful his world was, they would envy him. Most people did not know about the little rustlings in the grass. They did not know the feel of things, round things like eggs, and water-worm stones, rough things like rocks, or of leather, or of skins. They did not know anything about smells. They went through life with blind noses.

Sukhram spent his time herding his father's hundred goats. He knew them by the sound of their cloven hoofs on the stones, by their smell. It was easy to herd goats. When Sukhram called, they came. When he played the flute, they followed him over his father's fields and hills' beyond.

There was less heat in the sun now. It was time to go. Sukhram got out his flute, raised it to his lips, and blew a note softly. He could feel a movement about him. The goats had raised their heads and were looking towards him. He blew again. The goats were all about him. Now he would play them down the mountain and into the shelter, and tomorrow he would lead them out again. It was a happy life.
